From THE NEW YORKER, December 14, 1992: -

          In March 1986 Frederic Alan Maxwell spent 17 hours in the DC jail for failing to leave his seat in the Library of Congress. As a result of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings pressure, library officials had announced that public reading hours would be curtailed, moving closing time from 9:30 to 5:30.

          Maxwell calls the L. of C. "My love, my library," and spends 12 hour days poking through the stacks in his occupation of

          12 hour days poking through the stacks in his occupation of free-lance researcher.

          A group called "Books Not Bombs" staged a "decorous" sit-in, going round after the librarian had turned off the lights and turning them back on again, then sitting down quietly for their demonstration. Maxwell was one of three of these to be sent to jail.

          Recently, however, Library officials announced amended hours:
          only closing the reading rooms early on Fridays and Tuesdays and every Sunday in the summer. Maxwell further extolls the Library, "It's the most eclectic and egalitarian place in Washington, and...... The core of the free and thinking world."
                                        (Thanks to BG for this item.)
